Link to Colleges Came as a Surprise

Disclosure that the Central Intelligence Agency has secretly supplied funds to the National Student Association came as a surprise to Frank C. Strasburger, 21, of Baltimore, Md., Princeton University senior who was a delegate to the NSA national convention last year.

At the same time, Hugh C. Hansen of Hicksville, N.Y., chairman of the NSA chapter at Rutgers University, said yesterday that local chapters know little about the central office's activities.

The undercover arrangement with the country's largest student group has been going on more than a decade.

Strasburger was one of four Princeton delegates to the convention at the University of Illinois last August.

"I knew NSA was strapped for funds in the early fifties; in fact, it still is," Strasburger said. "However, it did surprise me that a group with the idealism it professes, and I think it has after my summer experience, would enter into any covert deal."

"It is primarily an educational and not a political organization," Strasburger said. "... What usually happens at the conferences is that Vietnam, the draft and other controversial votes are left to the end of the conference when the large middle-of-the-road group has usually left. The only people remaining are those with strong feelings one way or the other. There is a liberal majority in that group."
